

Whitepaper Executive Summary

To Compete With the Software Giants, Budget Isn't Everything. Maybe You Just Need to Be At the Right Place At the Right Time. Here's How You Do It.

Most buyers in the enterprise software space wait until a triggering event happens to begin even contemplating buying a solution. Whether it be a data breach, broken code, the need to update legacy systems, or a fine for non-compliance – it's usually these events that motivate prospects to enter the sales journey.

For the small software vendor, the key to competing with the software giants is dedicating your marketing resources to making sure your brand is positioned at the right place at the right time to meet these prospects when they're in their moment of need.

Unlike most multi-national corporations, you likely don't have the resources to be everywhere all the time with your branding and marketing. Even with the best software products, the journey to rank high in targeted search results is often a Sisyphean endeavor. And simply showing up in front of your prospects' faces is a small part of the battle. You have to create a lasting impression with the right content to be a consideration when their sales journey begins.

To create that lasting impression, one thing you should be doing is spending a portion of your marketing resources on trying to get your logo to come across your prospects' screens at least once a day. This can be done through relatively inexpensive social media posting or PPC advertising. And once your prospects are ready to engage in more in-depth content, you can move them along in the sales cycle with increasingly targeted, pertinent messaging to address their specific business needs, ultimately turning them over to your sales team.
